HISTORICAL SKETCH OF FRIENDS
 in
 CAYUGA COUNTY, N.Y.
 1795 to 1828

Hawland, E. 1882

As a broader, truer view is gained by retreating from our object, so the meaning of Quakerism, the work it has done in the growth of civilization and the progress of humanity, can be better understood by pausing a moment at the threshold, when it and all the outcome which have followed down the course of time, were centered in one, the illuminated soul of George Fox.

His life began in Leicestershire, one of the northern midland counties of England, in the year before the last of the reign of James I, in 1624. Of his parents he speaks thus: "My father's name was Christopher Fox; he was by profession a weaver, an honest man; the neighbors called him 'Righteous Christer.' My mother was an upright woman, and of the stock of the martyrs."

The boy was given little of the learning of schools, he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, who was also a grazier.

The latter vocation was suited to the growth of thought. While tending the flock on his native hills, the young shepherd pondered the deepest questions that propound themselves to the human mind.

England at this period was in the throes of Civil War. A tidal wave of liberty had risen beneath the throne itself, and shaken thence the sacred person of the king, whose "divine right" was to perish on the scaffold. An era of greater freedom was dawning. It was a time which ripened new ideas rapidly, and urged them to acceptance.

The young shepherd, now eighteen years old, fired by a religious enthusiasm, fostered by solitude and reading the Scriptures, wandered for some years in solitary places; sometimes he sought counsel and sympathy, but seldom found help; his advisers did not understand him, they thought him distraught, probably, and proposed activities of various kinds. One said "use tobacco," another proposed military life, another marriage, etc.

Thus ever he was turned inward. In his wayfaring he found some sympathy. The first person who accepted and preached his doctrines was Elizabeth Hooton.

In 1647 he appeared and preached in Manchester, causing great excitement which resulted in his making converts, and being imprisoned for a time. Thenceforth he exhorted in season and out of season, the length and breadth of the United Kingdom, and tried the tender mercies of the most of its prisons.

Everywhere crowds followed and listened to him; a magnetic presence and a convincing power often disarmed and made converts of his enemies. An intrepid bravery, an endurance which no peril, and no suffering could daunt, piqued the admiration of jailers and courts, while a tender pity for all suffering and a spirit of forgiveness, divine in its quality, characterized him.

In figure he was tall and massive, and his manners, to use the words of William Penn, were "civil beyond all forms of breeding."
