and Washington, on the Sabbath he passed in ~~the~~ attended public worship at Trinity Church, in the forenoon, and finished in a sermon from Rev. afterwards, Bishop Foster, and in the afternoon sat in Governor Bowdoin's new in Brattle Street Meeting-house, returning Governor Hancock's call after services.

Here, in the hospitable city of Boston, which was the place of his quiet, revolutionary retirement, with Benker Hill, and Lexington on his right, and in front the heights of Dorchester, from which he drove the British from Boston harbor, what pleasing associations must have been awakened; and with what joyous hopes must he have anticipated the bright future which was now realising, and for which we are indebted to him who was first in way, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

On Monday, he received calls, on Tuesday, a public dinner was given to him; and on Wednesday evening, he attended the grand ball at Court Hall. On the next day, he left Boston for the onward journey, pursuing his journey by Salem. And here we will take our leave of him.
