comes for his services; W.H. Morris, who lives on the old home farm at Harbourville, and with his sons operates it; Captain Lockhard Morris, now living at Rockland, Maine, also a retired 'deep-sea captain'; and Lathram, living in Massachusetts. Her only surviving daughter is Emma, widow of the late William Armstrong, a prosperous farmer on the North Mountain.

Of the many changes that have taken place since Grandma Morris first saw the bay shore, space does not permit mention. It may be said, however, that she had seen but never rode on a railway train, she has had automobile rides in a car owned by one of her grandsons, and she has actually seen an airplane on its trip across the Bay of Fundy, between Halifax and St. John. She still keeps house, having reserved a part of the old homestead for her own use, does all her own housework, including washing and ironing, and looking after her own flock of chickens and makes periodical visits to her son, Bloomfield, a distance of nearly a mile, whenever roads and weather permit. Her children, grandchildren and great-grand-children, and possibly great-great-grand-children will easily total a hundred.

The history of Harbourville is full of stories of the sea; tragedies without number have taken place right here on her own bay front most notably in recent years the coming ashore at this point of the stern of the New Bedford schooner, A.W. Allen, that although never missed, had been wrecked at this point, hundreds of miles off her course and thirty-eight lives lost. In our little cemetery on the bluffs overlooking the bay there rest numbers of unknown dead whose bodies were brought in by the tides, gathered up and given a decent burial by the tender hearted inhabitants.

There are very few (if any) families, living in or near Harbourville, that have not some loved one that sailed away from home and never came back. It has its record of noble deeds done by her sons both dead and living in the saving of lives at sea, records that were recognized by the government of the United States and Canada, and it has also had romances of the sea.
