Civil War Burials in the Fort Snelling Post Cemetery

Stephen Osman and Brenda Williams

Responding to orders from the Quartermaster General, Captain C. W. Nash transmitted a report of burials at the Fort Snelling post cemetery to Washington in April 1866. The post cemetery had been in use since at least 1821, when Colonel and Abigail Snelling's infant daughter Elisabeth became the first burial. An earlier military cemetery, located at the base of Pilot Knob on the Minnesota River, held the forty or so soldiers who died of disease during the previous two years. Over the next 40 years the post cemetery would receive soldiers and officers, and their wives and children.

The largest number of interments, nearly 90, was of soldiers and recruits who died at the fort during the Civil War. An additional 19 soldiers are listed in the rosters as having died at Fort Snelling; their bodies were likely claimed by family and buried elsewhere. Some of these were initially buried in the post cemetery, as mounds not containing graves are mentioned. The nature of the 1866 report indicates that Captain Nash simply recorded what could be read on the headboards, and that he did not utilize a burial register. A follow up report the next year stated that the cemetery then contained 155 graves, 144 of which were supposed to be U.S. soldiers of which only 80 could be identified. It also stated that no records were available of deaths in the recruiting rendezvous, located within a large board enclosure between the cemetery and the stone fortress.

In 1882 a new post cemetery was established southwest of the ongoing military construction along Taylor Avenue. Thereafter no new burials were made in the old cemetery. As the area of the lower post on the Mississippi River bluff was developed in 1904 by the addition of two new cavalry barracks and four stables, graves in the old cemetery were removed to the cemetery on the upper post. When the Fort Snelling National Cemetery was established in 1939, all of the graves in the newer post cemetery were moved there.

Additional reports were made to the Quartermaster General in 1879 and 1882. These list fewer identified graves and increasing numbers of unknown burials. This and several errors in the original 1866 report indicate that wooden grave markers had most likely been used during the war years. The apparent errors in Captain Nash's report also relates to errors and omissions in the rosters. In transcribing the report we looked at the 1866 report of the Minnesota Adjutant General, and the supposedly corrected rosters in Minnesota in the Civil and Indian Wars. The physical presence of a headboard in the post cemetery raises questions about soldiers listed as having been mustered out, or having never been a member of a particular unit. New recruits were particularly vulnerable to falling between the bureaucratic cracks if they had not yet been assigned to a specific unit. With the wooden headstones long gone, this list might well be the only recognition of these young patriots whose military career was cut short by disease or accident at Fort Snelling.

This table states the transcribed information, presumably taken from the grave marker, in the first 4 columns. Discrepancies are shown under Notes.

Listed as buried in post cemetery, April 1866.

An Unusual Obituary

Editor's note: In the last issue of Minnesota Genealogist, Gayle Geber wrote about the challenges of writing about uncomfortable events in family history. The author of a recent obituary, and probably also the departed loved one, apparently thought that a little humor can help. These three paragraphs are excerpted from an obituary published in the Williamsport (PA) Sun-Gazette http://Sun-Gazette.com).

"Mary was crazy. She had always been crazy. No, she never got over it. Being crazy was her full-time job. That and surviving were what she did, along with writing, the occasional post for Shakesville (a blog where she was known as Maud). She dropped out of school after her 2nd year of not attending the 10th grade, took an odd variety of courses at a variety of (mostly) community colleges, and was once fairly well-read, but had forgotten most of it."

"She was long-winded, discursive, and had a tendency to be too liberal, in some folks estimation, particularly with commas, supposing that is possible, and italics. Her favorite person EVAR was a beagle. Named Maud. She was incredibly creative and talented, especially with her poetry and gave better Christmas presents than even Santa, two years running. She loved the color purple."

"Mary knew some of you dislike the word crazy, preferring the term mentally ill, where warranted, which it was in Mary's case. She apologizes, posthumously, to anyone for whom it is unpleasant, but being it, she claims the right to own it, and this is her obituary."

by Stephen Osman

Responding to orders from the Quartermaster General, Captain C. W. Nash transmitted a report of burials at the Fort Snelling Post Cemetery to Washington in April 1866. The post cemetery had been in use since at least 1821, when Colonel and Abigail Snelling's infant daughter, Elisabeth, became the first burial. An earlier military cemetery, located at the base of Pilot Knob on the Minnesota River, held the forty or so soldiers who died of disease at nearby Camp Coldwater, 1819-1820. Over the next 40 years the post cemetery would receive soldiers, officers, and their wives and children.

But the largest number of interments, nearly 90, was of soldiers and recruits who died at the fort during the Civil War. An additional 19 soldiers are listed in the rosters as having died at Fort Snelling but not interred there; likely, their bodies were claimed by their families and buried elsewhere. Some of these could have been initially buried in the post cemetery, as mounds not containing graves are mentioned. The nature of the 1866 report suggests that Captain Nash simply recorded what could be read on the headboards and that he did not utilize a burial register. A follow-up report the next year stated that the cemetery then contained 155 graves. Although 144 were supposedly those of US soldiers, only 80 could be identified. It also stated that no records were available of deaths in the "recruiting rendezvous," several wooden barracks enclosed by a tall, wooden palisade between the cemetery and the stone fortress.

In 1882 a new post cemetery was established southwest of the ongoing military construction along Taylor Avenue. Thereafter, no new burials were made in the old cemetery. When the area of the lower post on the Mississippi River bluff was developed in 1904 by the addition of two new cavalry barracks and four stables, graves in the old cemetery were removed to the cemetery on the upper post. In 1939, when the Fort Snelling National Cemetery was established, it received all of the graves in the newer post cemetery.

Additional reports were made to the Quartermaster General in 1879 and 1882. These list fewer identified graves and increasing numbers of unknown burials. This fact, as well as the several errors in the original 1866 report, suggest that wooden grave markers had most likely been used during the war years. The apparent errors in Captain Nash's report also relate to errors and omissions in the rosters. In transcribing Nash's report, we looked at the 1866 report of the Minnesota Adjutant General,[1] and the supposedly corrected rosters in Minnesota in the Civil and Indian Wars.[2] The physical presence of a headboard in the post cemetery raises questions about soldiers listed in the report as having been mustered out, or having never been a member of a particular unit. New recruits were particularly vulnerable to falling between the bureaucratic cracks if they had not yet been assigned to a specific unit at the time of death. With the wooden markers long gone, this transcribed list might well be the only surviving recognition given of these young patriots whose military career was cut short by disease or accident at Fort Snelling.

The first four columns of the table state the transcribed information, presumably taken from the grave marker. Discrepancies found by the author are described under Notes.
