settled but not

Recounting some of the trials, privations and hardships endured by the first settlers. By one who participated therein to some extent. At the beginning of to the Nineteenth Century, Brookfield Township, Trumbull County was part of a dense and almost boundless forest. There was no waste land in the Township; the soil was excellent, the timber abundant and of the best quality of several varieties of Oak, Chestnut, Hickory, Sugar Maple, Poplar, some Walnut and Cherry, and other kinds. There was plenty of stone for all purposes. And the water supply was all that could be desired. Yet those who first attempted to settle there, had to endure privations and hardships that at last became insufferable. It is not surprising therefore, that some of them became utterly discouraged, abandon- () ed the struggle in despair, and departed, in the hope of finding some place where it would be easier to make a home.

My father came to Ohio in the spring of 1825. After having visited a number of places on the Western Reserve with a view to locating; he made choice of Brookfield; bought a tract of land and settled there. At the Northeast corner of this tract, a clearing of about three acres had been made; probably twentyfive or more years prior to 1825 judging from the size of the second growth trees, some of which had attained a height of over thirty feet, and a diameter of seven or eight inches a foot or so above the ground.

A few decayed and charred logs and a little mound of clay and rotten sticks that had once been a chimney showed where a cabin had stood. There was also a well that was filled up with rubbish, and almost hidden by brushwood and briers; but there were no signs of tillage or cultivation. Several large trees had been fell'd in the clearing, and they lay just as they had fallen and were now a mass of decayed wood, over spread with a thick covering of beautiful green moss.

An incident connected with one of these logs, I remember very distinctly. One autumn day while gathering hazelnuts along side of the log, I discovered by unmistakable signs that it was a pheasants drumming place. Next morning I placed a snare on the log, carefully covering it with thin moss. On visiting the place in the evening, I found to my great delight that my trap had caught the pheasant. These thickets were headquarters for pheasants, quail and rabbits.

This is a digression. There were some other places much like the one described above in different parts of the Township, but no name was attached to them. More work had been done at the place described than at any of the others. At some of them, only a few rods of ground had been cleared. All the cabins had been destroyed by fire apparently. About the people who had done this work, all was a mystery and conjecture. The oldest residents could give no account of them. They had come and gone, leaving nothing but these mementoes of baffled enterprise and blighted hope. There were several other abandoned cabins and clearings in our neighborhood, evidently of a later date than those described above. Where much more land had been cleared and larger cabins built. These settlers had stayed long enough to give names to their temporary homes and had taken some part in the civil affairs of the Township. But after years of toil and hardship, they too became discontented or discouraged and left, probably about 1815. Whether it was because of failure to meet the payments on their land contracts when they became due, or for other reasons, I do not know.

About the year 1800, Judge Samuel Hinckley, a wealthy capitalist of Massechusetts, became by purchase of draft from the Connecticut Land Company sole owner of the township, and soon thereafter began to sell land to the settlers. Nearly all sales were made by Contract; the terms of which were strictly enforced. A Portion of the price must be paid in hand, and the balance in deferred payments with interest. If the purchaser failed to meet these payments at maturity, the result would be annulment of the Contract, forfeture of what he had paid, and no remuneration for improvements; at the option of Mr. Hinckley. Nor were these contracts transferable without his consent, which was rarely if ever given. Thus all chance of saving anything out of the transaction by selling to a third party, was prohibited, and the ownership went back to Judge Hinckley. When these reverted lands were again offered for sale, the full value of the improvements were added to the price.

For many years the Judge made annual visits to Chio for the purpose of collecting moneys due him and selling more land. On such occasions there was always more or less surveying to be done. And after 1825, he would send for my father to do such work. In time, their intercourse became very friendly. On one occasion when the old gentleman was more irritable and snappish than was common, on account of someone having failed to pay, my Father ventured to mildly remonstrate. He spoke of Mr. Hinckley's wealth and the other's poverty, how hard it was to get money and so on. Finally he reminded the Judge that he was growing old, and that in the course of nature it would not be many years until he would have to part with all his wealth. This roused Mr. Hinckley and his reply was characteristic of the man. He said "Yes, Yes, I know that part of it is true and thats the h -- 1 of it." A few years afterward, he discontinued his visits to Brookfield, and Joseph Lyman, a grandson became his agent; acting as such until all the land owned by Judge Hinckley or his heirs in the Township was disposed of. This change was duly appreciated by all who were in debt for their land. Mr. Lyman was much more accommodating and lenient than Mr. Hinckley had ever been.

In 1825 Connecticut, New Jersey and Pennsylvania were about equally represented in the population of the Township. There were three or four families from Massachusetts, and about as many from New York State, one from Vermont, and possible a few from other States, but I think not, nor were there any of foreign birth.

Quite early in the century, probably about 1805, there came some fifteen families from Eastern Pennsylvania and known as "Pennsylvania Dutch". They settled in the north east quarter of the Township on high lands east of Yankee Run. This settlement was known ever after as the "Dutch Ridge". The people were industrious and prosperous, but for a long time they were inclined to be rather exclusive in their intercourse with other settlers, retaining their own manners and customs. Prominent among them were the Arthurholts, Daniel Sr., Daniel Jr., and John. They bought quite a large tract of land, extending from the ridge to both sides of Yankee Run. John being a practical miller, proceeded soon after their arrival, to build a flour or it was called a "Grist Mill" where excellent flour was made from wheat and buckwheat. The two Daniels built a Saw Mill, and also an oil mill where Linseed Oil was manufactured on a small scale. These mills were profitable to their owners and of great benefit to the public generally.

Then there was Andrew Messersmith, an all around blacksmith and quite adept in steelwork, making edge tools, hay forks, etc. The others were thrifty farmers, as their fields of grain bore evidence in later years. Nor did these people develope the propensity to rove from place to place, so characteristic of Americans; most of the farms being still occupied by the descendents of those early settlers. The only other instance that I can call to mind is that of Benjamin McMullen, who still lives on the farm bought by his father about one hundred years ago. Ben having added hundreds of acres thereto.

Other Pennsylvanians were of a different type. They were mostly from Westmoreland, Washington and Allegheny Counties; of Scotch Irish descent; some from Mercer County, Pa., of pure Irish blood. Although their parents came from Ireland and "that rich Irish Brogue" was ever present in their speech, they resented being called "Irish". They were of "This Kentry born". Clearly therefore, not Irish but Americans. The (Jerseymen or Geruymen) were nearly all farmers of the grain producing kind and first class ones at that . Then there was Capt. James Christy, for many years the only carpenter in the Township; but who after he had taught his craft to others, became one of the foremost farmers.

There was William Coon, the Tailor; Philip Winterstein, the Boot and Shoemaker; and Thomas Chew, Esq., and his son Jonathan, who made fur and wool hats of the everlasting kind; and carried on farming besides.

My Father, Abraham Adams, besides farming, did a great deal of surveying, both in Ohio and Pennsylvania.

The New Englanders were more inclined to raising cattle and sheep, and engaged in the dairy business to some extent, especially in making cheese. But they also raised grain sufficient for their own use. Prominent among them were two large families named Hart and distantly related. The first to come were Gad Hart Sr., and his six sons and four daughters. This was in the decade from 1810 to 1820, I think. They settled at the "Center" as it was called, where Alvah and Gad Jr., "kept store" for some years and then moved to Hartford Township; their brother Ambrose taking their place in Brookfield, where he was the leading merchant for many years. Of this once numerous family, the only one of whom I have any present knowledge is Dr. Albert Hart of Cleveland, son of Ambrose.

In 1823, Bliss Hart, Esq., with four sons, four sons-in-law and their families came from Hartford, Connecticut and bought some three hundred acres in the southern part of the township, where they all settled. Their log cabins, barns and school house constituted quite a village that was known for many years as Hartsburg. At one time, taking in three or four households not of the Hart family, the population of Hartsburg numbered seventy-five persons. But its cabins and its original inhabitants have long since passed away and Hartsburg is only a memory of the long ago. Robert S. Hart Esq., still living in Brookfield being the sole representative there of that once thrifty settlement.

About 1830, three or four Irish families came to Brookfield, namely the Groves, Canfields and Bradleys. Two of the Groves were weavers by trade. But in those days, the good housewives not only spun their wool, flax and tow, but many of them did their own weaving as well. If they did not own a loom, they borrowed the use of a neighbors and went there to do their weaving. In 1826, Franklin Peck and John Myers built a fulling mill, where cloth was dressed and wool carded into rolls. To this mill the homemade flannels were taken; and those designed for women's wear were colored and pressed. For men's use, these were fulled and colored; or if for a very fine suit of clothes, sheared and pressed also. I might here describe the whole process of making linen cloth. From the growing of flax to the finished fabric, bleached to snowy whiteness, and ready to be made up into wearing apparel or bed clothing, but I do not think it necessary, suffice it to say it was all done within the family.

In 1837, eight families of Germans came and made choice of the central portion of the northwest quarter of the Township. Hitherto, this section had remained an almost unbroken forest, on account of its extra heavy timber. But to these sturdy Germans, that was no objection. They were evidently pretty well supplied with German coin when they came. At any rate, they paid for their land and then went in to win. And win they did, industry and economy prevailed throughout the settlemant. They cleared land, built cabins and fences. Prosperity was soon manifest among them. Today there are no better farms in Brockfield than those in "Germany" as the settlement was called. Nicholas Wendler Esq., now of Hartford, Chio then a boy of perhaps ten years was the only one among them when they came that could speak English. And when Nick would come to assist his Countrymen in their purchases at the store where I was a clerk, his English was very emphatic at times. Those who came later on, were single families, generally and in most instances relatives of those who had come before.

But I must return to earlier times and other matters. In another part of this narrative I alluded to some deserted clearing and cabins. East of our home, nearly a mile away, in an old field, and on the bank of Yankee Run, at least a half mile from any road, there stood an old log ruin, without roof or floor, door or window, and only part of a stick and clay chimney. Near by were three or four half dead apple trees. It was about as lonesome a place as one could imagine. It was known as the Jones Cabin and was the birthplace of the Venorable Harrison Jones, of Alliance, Ohio. One of the first and most eloquent Preachers of the Disciple Church. The Whitaker place was about three fourths of a mile south of us, where some ten acres had been cleared, a portion of which had been cultivated, the rest had grown to brambles and brushwood. Only the walls of the old cabin were still standing in 1825; the roof having long before fallin in. Tangled vines inside and out, nearly hid the logs and altogether it was a hideously wild place. Down by a rocky ledge lot not far away, there was a circular wall of loose stones that marked an Indian's grave and this only added to the gloom.

I might name and describe several other similar places for they were there but a description of one will answer for all. The reason why I have written so much about these places is because they were the primary and essential element in the permanent and successful settlement of the Township. They were the nucleuses around which in the course of time, thriving farms with good buildings, first orchards, etc., took the place of the lone, little cabin in the woods. And it was fortunate for those who came later that there were so many of them.

When men began to arrive who had money to pay promptly for their land and buy some stock besides, they were pretty sure to select one of these deserted places if possible, as it gave them a foothold, so to speak. It was with those who made these beginnings, as it generally is in important enterprises, some must endure privations, toil and hardship for little or no recompense, that others may enjoy the advantages resulting therefrom.

In 1825, there were six or seven school districts in the Township. The school houses with one or two exceptions, were built of logs and the furnishings were of the cheapest kind. A wide board fastened to the walls and extending around three sides of the room, with a seat in front of it of equal length, served as a writing desk. Here the first and second classes were seated. Benches for the smaller scholars were made of slabs with the flat sides up, holes being made and pins inserted at each end, that served as legs. These benches were movable, and at the noisy noon hour, they were often overturned to the great detriment of toes and feet. At one end of the room was a wide fire place, where nearly half a cord of blazing wood threw out its heat on cold days. The fuel was furnished by the patrons of the school, and was brought in "Sled Lengths" and was cut into proper lengths for the fire place by the "Big Boys" at the noon hours. One of the boys was also selected every evening to build the fire next morning. A broom was furnished and it was the duty of the big girls to see that the room was kept On one side of the fireplace, there were pegs on which the girls hung clean. their hoods and shawls. On the other side, the boys hung their hats and caps (they did not have any overcoats). On this same side too, was a wide door that gave ingress and egress to this temple of learning. On the opposite side from the fireplace, near the other end of the room, on a raised platform, was the teacher's desk or table, behind which was a chair for the Special use of the Autocrat. The branches taught were Arithmatic, Reading, Writing, and Spelling. The books generally used were the Western Calculator, the English Reader, The American Preceptor, the New Testament, and Webster's Spelling Book. Our writing materials consisted of a quire of unruled Fool's Cap paper made into a book. At the head of each page the teacher wrote a line to be copied through the page. Our ink was generally a decoction of Maple Bark boiled down to the right color. We used Goose Quill Pens, which the teacher must make and then keep them in repair.

For the winter term, male teachers were commonly employed at the munificent sum of Twelve or Fifteen Dollars per month. The summer terms were generally taught by females, for about Two Dollars per week. The teachers always "Boarded around" with their pupils. They were paid by the patrons, in proportion to the number of days their children attended school, a daily record of which was kept by the teacher.

About the year 1832 a "High School" was opened for the benefit of the Young Ladies of Brookfield and vicinity, by a Mrs. Anderson, wife of the Presbyterian Minister, a sister of Mrs. Phebe Sutliff of this city. Here Grammer, Geography, History, Natural Philosophy, Algebra, etc., were taught. But the enterprise was not successful owing to a want of interest on the part of pupils as well as patrons and in a few months the school was closed. A few years later most of these branches were taught in our common schools. Teachers of a higher grade were employed and salaries proportionally increased.

For many years the roads in Brookfield hardly deserved the name. Owing to sparse population and the great amount of work that had to be done on their land; it was next to impossible for the settlers to make roads properly and keep them in repair. Then too there was another difficulty that was hard to overcome. It was the lack of natural drainage in places. It was hard to make ditches on account of so many stumps and roots. So the only remedy was "Corduroy" as it was called. Poles were laid side by side, making a kind of floor over the mud. On the South Center Road, there used to be a stretch of this kind nearly a mile long. West of the Center was another piece not so long; and East of the Center another short stretch.

A drive over these roads was a horror to both team and teamaster. The muddy water spurting up between the poles sometimes ten feet high. And when the poles began to decay, which they did in a short time, matters were worse if that were possible. It was not until the forests were pushed far back and roots and stumps had rotted out, that the land became dry enough to make anything like good roads in such places.

I can remember when there were only five public roads in the Township, besides the Center or State Roads that crossed at the Center. One was called Bedford Road, beginning at the Center, its general course was South easterly diagonally through the southeast quarter of the Township, across the northeast corner of Hubbard Township, leaving this State and ending in New Bedford, Pa. Its whole length being about ten miles. It was a very old road, crooked, hilly, stony and our end of it, at least, hard to keep in repair. There were two roads not much better than by-ways that led from the West Center Road through the southwest quarter to the Hubbard Line. They were not much traveled. Another one starting at a point about a mile North of the Center, ran northeasterly passing the Arthurholt Mills to the "Dutch Ridge" thence north into Hartford Township. There was one more, leading from "Dutch Ridge" in a southerly direction bearing east until it intersected another road at the State Line near Wilson's Mill. They were all very bad roads when I first knew them and yet I do not suppose they were any worse than those in other sections of the country.

About a mile south of Sharon, Pa. and not more than forty rods east of the State Line, on the bank of the Shenango River, there used to stand an old log The foundations next to the bank having settled a good deal, the old mill. structure leaned menancingly landward. Two large props were placed so that the upper ends rested against the gable, and the lower ends against a high bank a few feet away. The road running under the props in front of the mill door. This is as I saw it in the year 1825. But it was still doing business as a flour mill as it had done for many years before; being the only mill within several miles of its site. The mill was owned by Mr. James Wilson of Brookfield. Some three years after I first saw it, Mr. Wilson demolished the old mill and built what was then considered a very large and up to date one in its stead. The building was substantial frame one. He was at great expense in putting in French Burr Mill Stones, screening and s---machine, and in short, everything that he thought necessary for the equipment of the first class mill.
